

Fifty years later, a dream revisited

50 years ago, a young African-American teen made history here. Today, his alma mater has more than 44 percent students of color.

THE APPLICANT was an Eagle Scout. He was a member of the National Honor Society, a class president and he had completed award-winning research on fuel cells. He was bright, charismatic and kind. So why did parents withdraw their students when he was accepted? Why did the student receive death threats? Why did some people think he would "ruin" the school? Because Lee Smith '65 was black.

Fifty years ago last month, Martin Luther King led the famous March on Washington. Weeks earlier that same year in 1963, St. Mark's admitted Smith to summer school as the school's first student of color without much fanfare. Now, the school sits at a record 44 percent of students self-identifying as "students of color." But when Smith applied in the fall of 1964 to be a full-time Marksman, he was entering a completely different environment. Parents threatened to leave, donors threatened to withdraw their money from the school and the Board of Trustees called a special meeting.

In the end, Ralph B. Rogers, then the president of the Board, took a determined position to integrate the school, and then-Headmaster Christopher Berrisford invited Smith and his family to a special meeting where he admitted Smith to the school. Rogers did not face total support. He overcame a "great, heated debate," in his effort to integrate. "St. Mark's was probably not ready to integrate," Smith said in a 2002 interview with The ReMarker. "Finally, though, the school came around and took a position. I was admitted and I would stay."

CONTINUED, PAGE 8

► by Dylan Clark, editor-in-chief, and Aidan Dewar, managing editor | illustration by Zuyva Sevilla, graphics director

Under Hackbarth's direction, security cameras installed for students' protection

By Ford Robinson
campus coordinator

Former SWAT team officer Dale Hackbarth, who took over as director of security this summer, has amped up the school's security by installing 50 new cameras around campus and utilizing the Raptor identification system.

The Raptor system answers the question

Dale Hackbarth
New security chief bringing change

'who is on campus?' Faculty members and visitors to the campus are required to wear an ID badge at all times. If a visitor does not have an ID badge, his driver license is run through the Raptor system, checking him on local and statewide criminal databases.

"When visitors who have a ID badge visit the campus, they are allowed to come and go as they please," Hackbarth said. "If they don't, they are run through the Raptor system and if they have any history, they aren't allowed on campus."

Hackbarth hasn't had a hard time changing from officer on campus to security chief.

"The transition has been smooth," he said. "I've been involved with St. Mark's for 20 years, so when the opportunity was given, it was a no-brainer."

While Hackbarth wants to implement new security measures, he hopes to keep the environment wholesome and friendly.

"We want everyone to be allowed on campus," he said. "We want a community where kids can walk from class to class without having to worry about their safety."

"Let the students study, the teachers teach, and us security guys focus on the security issues," Hackbarth said.

Hackbarth's presence at all of the parent previews has allowed him to instill confidence in the parents' heads.

"Just in the first month of school he has gone to all the parent previews," Wortie Ferrell, head of Upper School, said. "His presentation is not only informative but it also gives the parents an incredible sense of calm. Having someone articulate the security staff's goals as well as he and also provide that level of reassurance is incredibly valuable."

The security guards who work here stay here because they deeply care about the school and its students.

"Of all the people on the security force," Hackbarth said, "the least tenured security guard is three years. Everyone else has been here for longer than that, and that speaks volumes. The security force likes working here, and they stay here because they really do care about the St. Mark's community."

The security force has amped up security by quadrupling the number of cameras.

"We had 15 cameras going into the summer," Hackbarth said. "We have just now completed installing 50 new cameras putting us up to 65 in total."

Whether it be from checking lights to locking doors, the security team strives to keep the school a safe community. In order to do that, they must be observant and diligent.

"Our main goal as a squad is to observe," Hackbarth said, "to be diligent and to make sure everything is running smooth around here. If anything is out of the ordinary, we must take the correct precautions in order to resolve that situation."

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 1

On the 50th anniversary of the March on Washington, Lee Smith '65 and school administrators reflect on the school's integration and diversity at 10600 Preston Road

Headmaster Arnie Holtberg admires what Rogers and Berrisford did for the school.

"They were courageous.

There were an awful lot of people who were adamantly opposed to integration," Holtberg said. "But it was just the plain right thing to do. It was about justice and about equality—yes for African-Americans, but for all American citizens. It took a lot to do what they did."

Assistant Headmaster David Dini is thankful because he sees how students and faculty benefit from the decisions that were made 50 years ago. He sees the decision as an example of what we should continue to do, and believes a leading institution cannot just follow in others' footsteps.

"You have to do something that is right regardless of what the consequences would be," Dini said. "But the idea that merit and excellence ruled the day was important. Lee Smith deserved to be here, and the tremendous degree never met."

Further, Smith was glad to see some students were forward thinking and accepted integration without protest.

Robert Hoffman '65, Smith's classmate at St. Mark's and later at Harvard, remembered noting Smith's arrival calmly.

"It was high time the school integrated," Hoffman said in a 2002 interview.

Not all students were so welcoming though. Smith was sent home several times during the year in order to "protect his safety" from death threats. Even the Parents Association was hostile towards Smith.

"Some of them wanted my expulsion because I danced with a white girl," Smith said.

The Dallas Country Club, where football victory parties were held, told the school Smith would not be welcome at future events. Smith was also advised not to attend the Senior Party for fear of backlash.

"I was uniquely suited to this," Smith said. "Anyone more fragile would have been messed up. Berrisford was confident that I would do well, and if I did, doors for others would open. And to this day I consider St. Mark's to be my school as much as any other graduate would."

Smith paved the way for where the school is today. With a record 44 percent of students self-identifying as a "student of color," the school has undeniably changed dramatically since its inception in 1906 and eventual integration in 1963. But Director of Admission David Baker searches for many types of diversity — not just ethnic.

"I use the word perspective more accurately than I do the word diversity," he said. "In that sense, I value all kinds of diversity. Not just ethnicity. I think it's just as important that we have kids in the school who have grown up in teachers' homes, students who have grown up in firemen's homes, in mid-level manager's homes. Those are world views that we are impoverished without."

While students here may be accustomed to learning and growing amongst the diverse group of people Baker speaks of, the struggle in the 1960's that got the school to this record point is not to be taken for granted.

Holtberg knows a large factor in the growth of students of color can be traced back to the men who integrated the school in the 1960's.

"We did the right thing in the 60's, which was a very hard right thing for people to do, with a lot of controversy," Holtberg said. "Those are very brave people — Tom Hartmann, Mr. Green, Mr. Rogers. And here we are, the population of the greater Dallas area has changed, we are so much more diverse than we were. And St. Mark's now reflects that."

Holtberg also acknowledges the fact that as 50 years have passed, times have changed. The flashpoint issue that was the Civil Rights movement in the 1960s has evolved as American society has matured to become more accepting and more willing to learn from what makes us different rather than separate for those reasons.

"I think once the school became integrated in the 1960's, and we created a different non-discrimination policy here — coupled with the fact that American society and the population of America has changed dramatically over that period of time — we were going to be a more diverse place simply because of natural forces," he said.

For Baker, bringing together a student body that is diverse in many ways — ethnic, cultural, socioeconomic or other — provides a foundation upon which students can improve each other's learning experience by being exposed to different perspectives.

"I have many times referred to school in general as a large conversation," Baker said. "St. Mark's School of Texas is a large conversation. That's what it is. We talk about football. Coaches with coaches, players with each other, players with coaches. We talk about To Kill a Mockingbird, and what it means to stand up to injustice. The teacher talks to the students, the students talk to the teacher and the students talk to each other. We talk about lunch, we talk about opponents on the field and we talk about how to do differential equations. It is all one big conversation."

In making admission decisions, Baker takes all of these types of diversity into account.

"I say to parents a lot, 'What our goal is for your son is to make the young man sitting next to him smarter, and for the young men sitting around your son to make him smarter,'" he said. "The best conversations you will ever be in your life will be those in which there are a wide variety of perspectives, and we choose students who have a good perspective on the conversation. They make the conversation better."

HEADMASTER ARNIE HOLTBERG

We need to work with, to play with, to disagree with people who are different from us. That's America.

Holtberg sees Smith as one of the pioneers of the school because Smith was the first trailblazer who allowed many to follow.

"We need to work with, to play with, to disagree with people who are different from us," Holtberg said. "That's America. That's the world. That is fundamental to who we are. When it comes to who joins the school as a student, we want students who are up to the challenge. Students who will make the most of the opportunity and thrive. Students who will seek to contribute. That is the fundamental goal."

Now that the school is nearing 45 percent students of color, Smith has simple advice to offer.

"When I came, there were a few people who weren't particularly happy that I came to their school," Smith said. "What you need to know is that St. Mark's is not their school... St. Mark's is your school. St. Mark's gave me an excellent education. Take advantage of everything your school has to offer. Your classmates are your friends for life."

Paving the way

"Some of them (parents) wanted my expulsion because I danced with a white girl."

— Lee Smith, first African American student enrolled here.

Lee Stanley Smith
Smith's signature in the 1965 Marksmen.

of integrity those leaders had led them to that decision. That's what is special to St. Mark's to this day. There is a willingness to stick to the mission and make hard decisions that preserve integrity. We benefit from people who came before us, and hopefully others will benefit from what we do."

Smith, now a lawyer at the University of Texas at Austin, saw kindness as well as animosity during his time at 10600 Preston Road.

For example, an anonymous donor offered to pay his full tuition.

"If I had the fortune to meet the anonymous donor that made it possible for me to attend St. Marks, I would say a simple 'thank you,'" Smith said. "Our lives are connected even though we have

SCHOLAR Posing with nine white classmates, Lee Smith '65 (top row, second from the left) was a National Merit Scholar his senior year. The first black student in school history, Smith had to deal with trials and tribulations but considers the school as his as much as any other graduate would.

